I could have enjoyed working longer on this one, but need to keep the amount of work somewhat constant across all sessions in this larger experiment.

There is a floor which forms two roads, it feels light-weight. The structures also feel light-weight. There is more emphasis, or importance, on the smaller turquoise structure on the left, than on the larger structure to the right which feels light-weight. No humans or animals detected, no plantlife and no water detected, this is a manmade structure, the shapes are like a vehicle or an architecturally interesting structure. It is more like curved steel metal surfaces, than something proper like bricks or stone. There is a green ceiling over us instead of open sky, and the floor had pointy turquoise-blue shapes. People can climb up by a ladder to a higher area on the right-side structure. The white as well as yellow color lines are significant and present at the target site. We can go inside the right-side structure.

I now see the target, then create and see a decoy, no self-matching was made.

Comment at feedback: Black and white target images tend to give me problems. I do see a resemblance. Did the floor and the structures feel so light-weight because this is a black and white image? The resemblance is however good, even the two roads are there. OH WOW! Now I saw it! The dark green ceiling that I drew is exactly like the dark arch on the target picture! I did not perceive the large trees, or the vertical cone structure on the right on the target image, but the resemblance I think is very good. A nice surrealistic rendering of this target image.

10:50 AM End session.

Problem: The decoy file is hardly even an image. I decided to save it and to create also a second decoy. The second decoy does show resemblance to the report I drew, with the serrated teeth and the shapes and I recognize the feeling, it reminds me of the smaller structure I drew on the left side. Merging is suspected.
